It is very different, and not too user friendly, but this is my first time to use a virtualization manager, so I am not sure about how to use it completely, other than some of the standard set of things like backup, restoration etc. One thing I did notice is that there were 5 other back ups that were creating the same backup. In their task manager, they all listed to the same C: drive and I can see where they are all storing their backups on the local machine. Not sure if I am doing something wrong or if there was a glitch in the installer. I will have to investigate later and will post my findings back here. The free edition 6a5afda64c

Choosing Components - Your application needs Choosing the right hardware should not be a challenge. However, if you need to choose from a range of available hardware, it's certainly a consideration you need to make. You can't just buy the cheapest solution. It may be cheaper, but the performance and capability of the product you choose may not be optimized in the way you need it. When it comes to the performance of your Veeam solution, your application will make use of the storage space on your server, which in turn will make use of the I/O performance of the server. If your solution has been installed on a server with low-capacity I/O components, or with a server that has low I/O capabilities, then you'll need to upgrade the server to a device that has a high-capacity I/O component. This usually means adding memory or adding another disk to the server. You may need to upgrade the server because the software was not installed or configured correctly, or because you need more storage space for backup data. The purpose of backup, and hence of Veeam, is to ensure that backup data is available in the event that your application crashes, a VM on the server fails or crashes or you need to move large amounts of data off-site. If your server is a VMware server, you can specify your preferred size of storage components in a simple manner
