Prognosis for patients suffering from pancreatic cancer is poor, with the five-year survival rate after the disease has spread being less than 3%, and after the cancer has metastasized nearly 100%. It is also one of the more difficult cancers to diagnose early, resulting in more patients dying of the disease after its metastatic spread has already occurred. This has motivated intense study of the molecular mechanisms underlying pancreatic cancer. However, there are relatively few known targets for the development of cancer therapies. Charcot-Leyden crystal (CLC) proteins are calcium-binding glycoproteins associated with endo- or exocytosis of secretory vesicles. CLC proteins are expressed in a tissue-specific manner in the mammalian epidermis. Calcium-induced vesicle exocytosis is thought to provide a first line of defense against a wide variety of pathogens and other toxic agents, both inside and outside the epidermis. In this role, it is possible that abnormal activation of this mechanism is also implicated in a number of pathological conditions such as cystic fibrosis (where elevated calcium concentration is a characteristic of the ion transport defect in cystic fibrosis epithelia) and psoriasis. Human skin CLC is a trimeric molecule comprised of a COOH-terminal CLC repeat domain containing an EF-hand calcium-binding domain, a hydrophobic transmembrane domain, and a short NH₂-terminal domain with some similarities to spectrin. Two CLC genes (CLC1 and CLC2) have been identified in the human genome. CLC1 and CLC2 are located on human chromosome 11 and chromosome 3, respectively, each consisting 0cc13bf012
