What's new in Elden Ring:

Sat, 08 Sep 2013 17:30:11 GMT79ef0c18-1c65-4225-984f-5c8c8c745986:3827893David Goldman0 Elder Scrolls Lands Between Lands Between continues to build upon the Elder Scrolls V: Skyrim's modular architecture, patching in detail and making it all the more enjoyable to experience the game, either solo or in multiplayer. Now you'll find new features for all parties, an exciting new character creator, and -- most exciting of all -- you'll be able to play the solo module in one of three dungeons that demand to be explored. "The Lands Between", as it's called, is a cooperative experience based on the third game in the parent Elder Scrolls series. Bethesda creates a solo castle or dungeon, then connects it to the multi-player universe through a hallway. You can't solo all of it, but if you finish The Lands Between, you'll go through the real thing that activates the points of interest to all the players. For instance, as a team of four, you can explore the four different sections of the dungeon: The Field, Hammerwatch, Prison, and Watchtower. After completing the appropriate dungeon, you face the final encounter where you prevent a geomancer from opening the gate to the Elder Scrolls: Oblivion for the first time. Eventually, you'll be able to unlock a fortress, a weapon, and a windstone. The progression is a little (and I mean very) behind the objectives set by the story. If solo play makes you a little nervous, don't worry. Each module's content is self-contained and balance and error checking are thrown in to ensure smooth experiences. Play it once, and it's pretty much a fun experience. Play it twice, and you get a powerful help system for your own progression. You're also going to want to explore The Lands Between in the first two weeks to unlock some really nice feature. Once you've saved, you can continue exploration of the dungeons. Here's a list of the new features:]]> The Elder Scrolls Lands Between Lands Between continues

On Friday morning, Binance CEO and co-founder Changpeng Zhao predicted that Binance would issue its own token to build a bridge to the traditional financial industry. The crypto markets have been under pressure ever since Bitcoin's recent rise to levels unseen in the past three years. And last week, another crypto exchange announced it was going to issue its own token in a bid to "unify" the markets. But could there be a bigger opportunity for the crypto world than what was announced yesterday? Traditional finance, and cryptocurrency For the past several years, cryptocurrency has been touted as the magic solution to more efficiently move value and money around the globe. Ever since they've been around, crypto exchanges have made it very easy for traders to swap their tokens with other coins. But it wasn't until earlier this year that a major crypto exchange added fiat money to the equation. Earlier this year, Coinbase introduced trading of U.S. dollars, which caused an immediate surge in interest. After adding a crypto exchange, for the first time in Coinbase's history, volume soared. The company has been criticized for its slow transition, but there's no denying that it's made crypto a viable alternative for consumers. We believe that we are at the cusp of a new asset class, one that combines the best aspects of cryptocurrency and traditional asset classes. Now, with Binance's news, they're taking it one step further. By starting Binance Labs, Changpeng Zhao is making it clear that Binance is interested in disrupting the very foundation of finance. This means that cryptocurrencies aren't just about trading. They're about using cryptocurrency to solve real world problems. Perhaps the company's biggest area of interest is to develop financial services — anything that can make financial institutions work better or make their products more accessible to consumers. And that's exactly what Binance Labs is all about. Now, let's get to the news. What's Binance Labs? Binance Labs is a not-for-profit organization dedicated to giving back to the broader crypto community. It will focus on building and empowering projects that want to revolutionize the world of finance — and, if that's
