The state Senate on Friday advanced legislation to create the new classification for fully autonomous vehicles. The goal is to give independent software developers and hardware makers — as well as automakers — enough time to win more regulatory approvals before they roll out their autonomous vehicles to consumers. “We are already drafting the regulations for SDVs in California. We have a clear path to ready the markets for fully autonomous vehicles while developing and implementing the regulations,” said Jennifer Friedenbach, director of the California Department of Motor Vehicles, on Friday at the American Automotive Policy Council, Automotive News reports. However, autonomous vehicles present “a complex challenge” for regulators, Friedenbach conceded in a statement released Friday with the American Automotive Policy Council. A new classification for autonomous vehicles could be a “cues” to automakers that they need to begin developing autonomous cars, she said, and it also allows for “flexibility for entrepreneurs and engineers to enter the emerging market for such vehicles.” A “practical” approach Created by California lawmakers, the new SDVT license would require a driver to submit a special application to the DMV for a “vehicle without driver,” or V2V, permit and have their driving history checked. The V2V permit would issue after the driver completes an online course on SDVs. The driving course would require 10 to 20 hours of practice and include a DMV-approved driver. Drivers could be certified as SDVs after they complete 20 hours of practice, but they cannot be certified as SDVs without also getting 0cc13bf012

The poll, conducted by Morning Consult in July, showed the debt increases as Americans get richer. To maintain income growth, Americans would have to borrow 10.8 percent of their income. The number is well above previous records, with the last high-water mark in 2007 reaching 9.5 percent. Americans are walking closer to being in a debt bubble, and it's not going away, a new poll found. A new Morning Consult poll, conducted in July, found that households' debt levels are at their highest point since 2007, when the economy was struggling. The good news for Americans? They're more willing to take on debt than in the past. The poll showed the debt increases as Americans get richer. To maintain income growth, Americans would have to borrow 10.8 percent of their income. The number is well above previous records, with the last high-water mark in 2007 reaching 9.5 percent. As credit-card debt surged in the late 2000s and has continued to balloon since the Great Recession, the debt load is so burdensome that some economists have said Americans are closer to a debt bubble than a real bubble, though they disagree about the timing.
