brand of the Electric Age - and if there is one thing you can not question the success of Microsoft Windows OS, it is the success of software. Programming needs to become the pure art of simplicity, but also find the code most people want to understand and interact with. I have programmed for many versions of Windows. They are all very difficult and indeed confusing to deal with. And whenever I have to deal with any version of Windows, I have to study the documentation at great length to understand what each "button" does, because Windows has a certain unwritten rule that you need to at least know how to do keyboard commands such as ALT, CTRL, F1, etc, and Windows make liberal use of them to get the screen to ask you to do things. It took me days to learn how to restore registry on XP when the XP CD came with such a detailed set of information under an Advanced tab. The more functions of Windows, the less you see of the actual visual interface, because Windows assumes most users are just browsing or sizing windows and just make 'passive' functions (turn power on, turn off etc). But such is life. As the musing... "I love the infinite The endless odds of us Than the unknown future All I want is forever" I wish I could have that. Not the forever part, that's still only a fantasy for me. Better off my fantasy is a phone call on Christmas. Yes I prefer the reality, I don't like to dream. Having dreams is a very painful experience, I would much rather wake up and appreciate the real thing. I would love to have a machine made for me. One that could sit on my desk and do everything I wanted. Want to play games? Have that done. Want to browse the internet? No problem. Want to access info about the area I live in? Get that
