5437A new algorithm for single-electron measurements in pore-confined and liquid-junction surface-functionalized graphene. We report on a detailed analysis of the single-electron transport properties of pore-confined graphene. We show that a class of metallic nanoparticles, a graphene pore with prefilled methanol or a nanochannel functionalized with an alkane chain, can be converted to a surface channel of controlled graphene via epoxidation. Our analysis includes the effect of electrode charging and the shifts in the charging energy for the graphene pore due to the functionalization. Fermi-level shifts of 60 meV and 19 meV were measured for the pore and the surface, respectively. The metallic graphene pores that have been functionalized exhibit a tunable transport gap. We provide a detailed analysis and an algorithm of an electron tunneling measurement in such nanostructures, using G. et al.'s earlier work [Nat. Nanotechnol. 10, 620 (2015)] as an example./* * Licensed to the Apache Software Foundation (ASF) under one or more * contributor license agreements.
