It seems there's a new buzzword on the internet. It's called #metoo. This is the Twitter hashtag for the brave individuals who have come forward to speak out about sexual abuse perpetrated by high-level figures in the entertainment industry. After its first use on Twitter in mid-December, the #metoo tag has since been incorporated into a number of other hashtags that have popped up to report sexual misconduct. Take a moment to think about what this might mean for you. In a week, you may or may not have been part of a shared experience that leads you to believe you should think twice about speaking up when people in authority abuse their power. You may decide to report what happened — either verbally or in writing — to someone in power or an authority figure. If you do speak up, you may not only feel nervous or fearful, but you may also develop patterns of dishonesty because you don't want people to know what happened. In worst case scenarios, people who have already abused their power can feel safe from repercussions because their victims are afraid to speak out. What is #metoo? #Metoo is the Twitter hashtag for women and men who have spoken about being sexually abused by or being afraid of powerful men who abuse their power — all the way from high-level elected officials to entertainment executives to famous high-profile CEOs to corporate leaders. The #MeToo movement also involves women who have spoken up about being sexually abused by or afraid of intimate partners, men who work in the entertainment industry, and priests who have sexually abused boys. The hashtag was first used to draw attention to misconduct on December 17th when actress Asia Argento posted a photo of her bloody clothes. She said Harvey Weinstein sexually assaulted her when she was a minor. She also wrote that she was sleeping with him in “revenge.” While #MeToo was not a new hashtag, to this point, the women who used it were the brave ones who had decided to speak out. The hashtag #womenmustache started trending in mid-January. (That's when actress Lesley Arfin decided she was fed up of all the men in her life who were “stalking” her.) In just a few months,
