Last weekend marks one year since the first-ever London Marathon. What a year it has been! The city couldn't have been more different the year before when people started talking about the possibility of course locations for the marathon. Then, London was slow to bounce back. Billions of pounds had been withdrawn from the construction of the new Crossrail station in Hammersmith. Tourists were wary about taking their families to the city's West End. And tourists weren't lining up at coffee shops to watch world-famous athletes perform. Now, I'm sure that I wasn't alone in spending the past year counting the number of time I passed commuters on a grey run (the normal route for leisurely running where the inclines are gradual and they're in sight). As I made them cheerful cuppas that I paid for with my own money - - I'd try to think about which London cyclists would most likely catch my eye if I were to see them cycling by. As we all know, the crowds that gather for the marathon are extraordinary! The completion of the first marathon was a remarkable and historic moment. It re-established London as one of the world's most popular marathon cities and brought home to the Big Smoke, that they had failed to become a 'World Marathon Champion City' back in 1982. The mayor and the Cabinet member for sports and Olympics joined TfL's director of communications and champion of the 2012 London Games, James Crowden, on the podium to congratulate the athletes on their achievement. Now, a year later, some 12,000 runners are expected to line up at 12:00 tomorrow for the 2013 London Marathon. The focus for 2011 and 2012 has been on what the organisers are forecasting to be the biggest marathon crowd in history. Organ
