It is presently known to incorporate a removable keyboard into a calculator so that the calculator can be used in conjunction with a table or desk top during use, and then lifted from the table or desk top and stored in a drawer or other storage area when not being used. However, these prior art calculators are relatively large and cumbersome, and thus are less satisfactory for many uses. What's the impact of running the settings.rb file inside my app (running in production) as opposed to creating individual.rb files for each settings element? Is it a one off cost or does it incur a performance hit for keeping everything in one file? Edit: Also, is there a way to enforce a load time of the.rb files, or is it based on access time? A: As long as there are no circular dependencies (in which case the system will eventually crash), this should not be a performance concern. This has nothing to do with performance: it's a default file to centralize settings. Just include it. Επιστρεμς για το «Twitter of Hate
