The effect of iron stores on the pig's sensitivity to the irritant effect of nickel sulfate has been studied in 18 weanling swine. Six animals had each of the following treatments: normal iron stores; depleted iron stores induced by a 3-wk period of dietary iron restriction; normal iron stores plus topical application of nickel sulfate, to which the animals were sensitized by 5 wk of oral exposure to nickel; depleted iron stores plus nickel sulfate; and normal iron stores plus nickel sulfate. Erythema was rated at hourly intervals for 12 h. Responses were significantly greater in animals with depleted iron stores than in those with normal iron stores, and were significantly increased by the application of nickel sulfate.
