As an individual moves, the muscles are in constant motion. For example, when a person sits down, the muscles of the person's back and lower legs contract for a brief time. The motion of these muscles forces a fluid out of these muscles, which, in turn, causes the blood vessels on the muscle to dilate, so that blood can flow through these vessels to replenish the nutrients of the muscle and other tissue. This pattern of muscle motion in response to movement can be considered the body's "fight or flight" response. The movement of the muscles results in their contraction and relaxation, which also causes the release of a fluid from these muscles and blood vessels. These contractions and relaxations create pressure pulses in the muscle, which travel through the muscle and surrounding tissue as a wave of compression and a wave of decompression. The wave of compression is called the "compression wave", while the wave of decompression is called the "recovery wave". During the periods between contractions, the muscles are gradually relaxing. The rate at which they are relaxing is affected by a number of factors, including the movement of other body parts. As a person moves, the muscles adjacent to the moving muscles relax, and the muscle is able to be more fully relaxed with less of a required movement. Therefore, as the rate of movement is slowed, the muscles become increasingly relaxed. During these periods between contractions, the blood vessels in the area surrounding the muscles relax as well, releasing fluid back into the interstitial fluid space. This causes the blood vessels adjacent to the movement to be increasingly relaxed, allowing more of the blood to be moved into the muscles as needed. When the person has completed the movement and stops moving, the muscle contracts, requiring more fluid to be drawn from the nearby blood vessels. Because these nearby blood vessels have become increasingly relaxed as the rate of movement has slowed, the blood vessels surrounding these muscles are able to absorb this influx of fluid at a faster rate, than if the movements occurred at a more rapid rate. When the person becomes still, the muscle relaxes, allowing the blood vessels to once again release the fluid, which is returned to the body in gaseous form. As the movement begins again, the cycle continues. If the person is sitting still, the fluid is allowed to move to and from the nearby blood vessels at a more constant rate. This fluid continues to circulate, even after the person has been sitting still for a period of time.(**
