On the heels of the final audio recording, reports from Chicago indicate that public hearings regarding the massive sit-in put forth by 14,000 radical students and mob workers will begin today in Chicago City Hall. Next weekend, in the last major push before the inauguration, Barack Obama will meet with a group of Black leaders to discuss the fraught relationship between the president-elect and the civil rights community. But the meeting comes amid a strange and distressing development in the campaign to force Obama to confront his past and confront accountability for it: The presidential nominee hasn't yet met with the father of one of the three men who shot his own step-father to death in 1988 — the Chicago Democrat who, in recent weeks, has become a liberal Democrat's most vociferous populist and Obama's most vigorous opponent. On Friday, the National Newspaper Publishers Association released a statement that was quickly picked up by commentators and won widespread notice, and approval, in establishment media. Dr. Roy Mitchell, a black leader, said that candidate Obama had "treated us as if we were an oppressed minority that he had to pacify." While the mainstream media have condemned him for not talking to Dr. Mitchum, they have also ignored several other important facts about his health care proposal. The candidate is aware of the anger and frustration that is pervading much of the black community because of the plans that are being proposed. He is very aware that he is going to have to do something about the anger, resentment and paranoia that are the legacy of slavery. Yet he remains confident that these feelings will be tamed if he can deliver his health care plan to the American people. The Progressive wing of the Democratic Party has taken an enormous amount of heat from the press for "dismissing" the black community — or, more recently, calling them "thugs" and "Reds." They are also chast
