Here's what I want to do: I have several entities that I want to store. I would like to avoid the huge number of fields associated with each entity. After seeing a webcast on EF I think the way to do this is to use a set data source in a one-to-many relation. That is, each of my entities will be in a table that has a one to many relation to my entities table. From there, I will be able to query the data that I want. Is this the best way to go about this? Okay, not quite the same as the iPhone X, but close enough. Cases of iPhone X clones abound, from a slew of popular Asian smartphones to obscure examples from China and other regions of the world. These clones look nearly identical to the real deal, save for a few exterior differences and one particularly notable feature. The glass back of the iPhone X is incredibly tough. And it's a super-solid form factor. But thanks to the super-thin design and the abundance of mobile technologies that are already out there, adding back a glass back is easier than you might think.
