
full of laughs, but it contains quite moving scenes," Chekhov said. The play was originally published in Russian in 1899, and included in Chekhov's first book "On my Life". Plot The play relates a little incident that happened in Sakhalin when Chekhov was traveling with his father to visit his family. While bathing in a river, the father sees a small boat and wonders who is in it. A young peasant woman in a shawl, her rosy cheeks and her clear eyes showing her to be slightly drunk, tells the old man that she is waiting for her husband to come back from the neighbouring island. The old man asks if he should call to the boat to come ashore so as to meet the husband. The young woman slaps him and says that she is very comfortable in her boat and is not going to come out until she sees her husband. The old man asks her if she will bring her husband a lunch and she agrees. The old man goes ashore with the bread and ham which he brought for the woman's lunch, but his little boat is immediately swamped by the current. The old man gets in her boat and that in which the woman is, but they sink immediately. A horseman appears and together they try to save the old man, who is under water. The horseman passes the woman on to the horseman and swims after the old man. The horseman's horse becomes exhausted, the man has not been able to hold on to the horse all the time, and the horseman tries to swim to shore. The scene is played for quite a while. The scene ends when the old man swims to shore. The horseman who is following him, sees a cask floating
