Much of the current interest in this topic has focused on the interaction of the rate of change of an experiment (so-called cognitive load) and the amplitude of this change (analogous to the variance in the change-point model). However, the effects of implicit cognitive load, such as a change in the level of attention, can be easily produced experimentally but cannot be resolved from a traditional ANOVA model. Using computerized psychophysical paradigms, we determined the effects of the implicit cognitive load produced by the presentation of larger input sets. In Experiment 1, response duration increased with set size, and this was followed by a decrease in response speed that was well described by a slow exponential function. In Experiment 2, the implicit cognitive load produced by task difficulty was effectively embodied in the probability of change. This was demonstrated by the stochastic representation of the exponential decline in response time across presentations. Application of the "rapid and slow" models of the generalizability of perceptual and cognitive mechanisms to psychophysical data provides a basis for understanding both within- and between-subject differences in performance. Implicit cognitive load is a significant limitation on the detection of change-

points and requires the use of more flexible statistical models.Q: how to set the default filename value in angular js

No meu código, eu gero um loop com um for e insiro em uma lista. e ai eu crio uma função que divide essa lista em 2, e devolve o número médio, e multiplica por 2, e resultando um vetor de números, eu mostro pra usuário. O problema é que não estou conseguindo mostrar esses números, meu código não está funcionando, e nem os números estão sendo inseridos no vetor, meu código: from numpy import * import math def
