Choroid plexus carcinoma and endodermal sinus tumour of the ethmoid sinus: a case report. A 55-year-old man was admitted to our hospital with occipitofrontal headache, dizziness, double vision and right ptosis. There was no visual symptom. No definite abnormal laboratory data and radiological findings were observed. Computed tomography (CT) and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) revealed a tumour extending from the right frontobasal sinus to the cerebral convex. Pathological examination showed a choroid plexus carcinoma (CPC) and endodermal sinus tumour (EST), both components of the mixed tumour. A review of the literature revealed that the CPC is rarely found in the cerebral convex. The principal learning objective of the Human Genome Mapping Project (HGMP) is the construction of a physical map of human chromosomes, consisting of ordered DNA restriction fragments, which will be distributed across the entire genome. The distribution of the fragments will define overlapping contigs of genetic material, called BACs (Bacterial Artificial Chromosomes). The initial release of the ordered DNA fragments will be made available to the community through international collaborations with leading DNA-sequencing centers, such as the Wellcome Trust Sanger Centre, the Baylor Human Genome Sequencing Center (Baylor), the Children's Hospital Genome Sequencing Center (CHGSC), and the Human Genome Center at the University of Washington. The distributed physical map will be used to build a physical map of the entire human genome, which will consist of a series of clones linked together through hybridization to individual BACs. The ends of the clones will be tagged so that the sequence of the clones can be determined, thus revealing the sequence of the entire genome. The final goal is to have a "finished" physical map of the human genome, available to the entire scientific community, as soon as possible, in order to serve as the "base" for the complete sequencing of the genome. This project will provide a valuable resource to the world scientific community and will be instrumental to the understanding and treatment of human genetic disorders. , with both companies basing their testing methodologies on algorithms to determine performance. But in his op-ed, Mitternacht points out that modern cryptographic software is much more robust, and that the Xfinity deal is helping a Comcast competitor. "But if it is a single [Xfinity] test, that's the extent of the review. Even if the test methodologies remain the same, the results will be skewed as Comcast passes along its own signal — and the benefits of this deal to them," Mitternacht writes. The deal is just one example of Comcast misusing its power, and the FCC has a clear enforcement power: it can deny Xfinity's license to use the Spectrum test centers if it feels the company is misusing them. The other obvious power is that the FCC can order a better, more transparent review of Spectrum's tests. "The FCC's failure to investigate these potential anticompetitive concerns was evidence of the commission's disregard of its responsibility to protect the public interest,” wrote FCC boss Ajit Pai in a scathing letter to the agency’s former press secretary Bill Allison. “The proliferation of the Spectrum reporting centers – all of which are controlled by the same spectrum licensee – warrants further scrutiny.” The FCC’s obtuse response to the problem of monopolies On the other side of this policy battle is Ajit Pai, who has been promising to crack down on the deal. The acting head of the agency set off a wave of controversy when he tweeted his approval of the Xfinity deal in November, as an FCC proceeding that was pending his appointment wasn’t public. But since then, Pai has twice called for hearings and has made several attempts to have the deal reviewed. Despite his promises to investigate the deal, Pai has had a harder time taking any action against Xfinity than he has against Sinclair’s anticompetitive practices. Pai said in September that he would “investigate” the deal, and in November, he called for hearings. But the FCC isn’t investigating the deal at all, and as the EFF notes, that means it can’t stop the deal from going through. “The [FCC’s] lack of action is unsurprising. According to The Intercept, Pai has directed the [FCC] to go after entities that press for investigations
