Stereological and cytochemical studies on the distribution of corticotrophs in the rat pars nervosa: techniques for single and double electron microscopy. The distribution of corticotrophs in the pars nervosa of the median eminence of young male rats was studied by single and double electron microscopy combined with a stereological technique, and a cytochemical technique for demonstration of glycogen and hydrocortisone in corticotrophs was evaluated. The density of corticotrophs in the pars nervosa was much lower than in the pars distalis, and they were distributed irregularly in the perikarya. The majority of the corticotrophs showed a pair of symmetrical nuclei and were arranged as clusters in the pars nervosa. Four large groups of cells were found in the pars nervosa of the median eminence of the hypothalamus. The first was an external layer of a loose network of cells surrounding the pars nervosa and occasionally their perikarya. The second was an internal layer of a loose network of cells surrounding the perikarya of the pars nervosa. The third was a cell group in the center of the pars nervosa containing dense chromatin in the nuclei. The fourth was the pars nervosa of the median eminence, and in addition to the dense chromatin in the nuclei, the perikarya contained large amounts of glycogen. The relationships between the corticotrophs and afferent fibres to the pars nervosa were studied with anterograde degeneration following application of 2% 3,3'-diaminobenzidine tetrahydrochloride. Corticotrophs never showed any direct nerve terminal contacts to the pars nervosa. Their processes seldom came in contact with the external layer of the loose network cells. The internal layer of the loose network cells was intimately related to the perikarya of the pars nervosa, and they sometimes showed direct nerve terminal contacts to the pars nervosa. Corticotrophs frequently received direct contacts from the third layer of the loose network cells, as judged by degenerated anterogradely labelled fibres in the pars nervosa. The most likely afferent and efferent connections for the corticotrophs in the pars nervosa were the perikarya of the pars nerv
