The organization may produce these organizational records in response to a request by the customer, or the organization may create the new database from scratch. In many instances, the organization has the organizational records in a relational database and then later creates the new database from the organizational records in the relational database. Typically, the organization moves these organizational records to a new relational database and then imports the relational database into the new relational database, or the organization converts the organizational records to a proprietary format that can be imported into the new relational database. Many of the existing techniques for moving the relational records of a database are not suitable for moving records of new databases. For example, one existing technique is to build a complete copy of a relational database, move the relational records to the new database and then remove the original relational database. This technique is time-consuming, the number of records is large and the type of organization-controlled data being moved is potentially large. Another existing technique for moving records is to use a database migration tool. However, this technique may have a high cost in that to use the database migration tool, all data in a database must be migrated and the migration tool may not be able to maintain database consistency, or manage database statistics, while migrating the records in the database. Accordingly, a need exists for improved techniques to move records between databases. Contact Us Meet Michael Michael is the founder of
