It .Q: JAVA sockets server unable to receive new connections, (//USER@HOST[0]:port/) I have a java application that is built on the idea of accepting a connection from a user, opening a thread in the server and passing the connection back and forth between the server and client. The user has the option to send commands to a server through the client, and have the server process them. I have been testing my client/server, and so far everything is working fine. I can connect to my server from multiple clients at once, I can send and receive commands. It's just when there is a new user (or connection) that I am having an issue. I am not receiving any new connections. I can see connections being accepted, but never sent or received by my client or server. I have done some research and it seems like a lot of people are running into this issue with Server sockets. I have tried to read other posts, but I don't understand enough of sockets to translate the answers to my application. I have tried creating a new socket outside of the server class, in the main class, and it does not seem to work. I have tested the server opening up with the same connection three times and receive the same response.
